STUDY THE TORAH AGAIN AND AGAIN, EVERYTHING IS FOUND IN IT

By Rabbi Rachel Sabath Beit-Halachmi

WHAT IS the most important act for a Jew? Prayer? Ethical acts? Ritual observance? Offering sacrifices? Settling and protecting the Land or State of Israel? This debate is as old as Judaism itself.

In the Bible era, the most sacred acts were the observance of God's laws and the offering of the proper sacrifices at precisely the right times. But, after the destruction of the Temple, the ancient Sages created a new culture in which prayer and study were just as significant. They, in their own way, understood that these behaviors had to be combined with ethical behavior (Torah im derekh eretz) because Torah and ethical practice together uphold the world—a balance they learned from the Mishnah. Another Sage insists this about the Torah: “Turn it over, and turn it over again, for everything is found in it (Hafokh bah v'hafokh ba d'khola bah). Constantly examine it...for there is nothing more excellent...”

Our Reform Sages of earlier eras stressed the sacred nature of the ethical, referring to Judaism as ethical monotheism. These and other sociological concerns led many Reform leaders to emphasize social action, in addition to prayer, as the most important acts for the Jew. The centrality of our concern with the ethical and with tikkun olam (repairing the world) characterized much of our activities and, thus, inspired our involvement in the Civil Rights movement, in feminist transformations, in protesting America's involvement in particular wars and arms accumulation, and in our work to feed the hungry and clothe the naked wherever we found them. Our Reform religiosity meant taking our religion to heart in all that we did in the world.

In recent years, much of the Reform community has moved into what Eugene Borowitz—the foremost theologian of liberal Judaism—has called the “second stage of Reform Jewish piety.” While significant changes in our liturgy are taking place gradually—indicated in part in the forthcoming new Reform prayer book, Mishkan Tefillah—some are taking on and renewing ritual practices once discarded by our founders. Many more are finding meaning in intensive Jewish study.

This, too, is a great Reform Jewish act. Just as some of our Sages knew that—more than any other single activity—the study of Torah is as fundamental to our rich cultural lives as bread itself, then we know that Torah study is as fundamental to our Jewish lives as social action and prayer. Our knowledge of the limitations of politics and humanism has brought us to a new readiness to engage with our traditional sources. As Borowitz recently commented, “We talk about [a place for God in our lives now] not in the accents of rationality but rather by reference to experience or relationship or even mysticism. That is accompanied by a fresh appreciation of what the classic texts of Judaism can teach us when they are read through the lenses of our emancipation.”

TURN IT OVER, AND TURN IT OVER AGAIN,
FOR EVERYTHING IS FOUND IN IT.
CONSTANTLY EXAMINE IT...
FOR THERE IS NOTHING MORE EXCELLENT... .
